THE PEERS SUCCUMB.

THE discussion in the House of Lords of the bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church was resumed last evening, and continued during the night until 3 o'clock this morning, when, as announced by a cable despatch received this morning, the House divided, with the following result:-In favor of passing the bill to the second reading, 179; against lit, 146; giving a majority of 33 in favor. Considerable excitement attended the closing discussion of the measure, the galleries being crowded as well as the benches of the House. But there was no new point developed by the opponents of disestablishment, their speeches being made up simply of reiterations of the stereotyped arguments with which the world is already familiar, with an occasional impugning of the motives of Mr. Gladstone, the Prime Minister, and father of the bill. When the vote was taken 325 peers, as shown above, were present. The entire number entitled to seats in the House is about 465, but there are scores of peers who habitually neglect the exercise of their hereditary privileges as legislators, being more attached to the excitements of the turf and the joys of the wassail than to the strifes of party. Even when all the interests involved in the question are considered, the vote was an extraordinarily full one, and the majority. small as it was, ensures the final triumph of the project of disestablishment. The bill will now undergo the process of a careful consideration in detail. Attempts will be made by the wire fories to break its back with a burden of amendments; but the chances are that none will be saddled upon it that will not receive the sanction of the House of Commons. The conservative peers and English bishops who have spoken in favor of permitting the bill to be read a second time, have all declared their purpose of insisting upon amendments which will modify materially the more objectionable clauses of the measure; and unless they should carry this purpose to the extreme and impair the vitality of the bill, in all probability the House of Commons bishops have been. When the bill first came before the House of Lords, there was every indication that it would be defeated by a majority of seventy or eighty votes, a probability which was apparently increased by the action of the recent Conservative caucus. But the announcement | he has voted. The polls are closed at 6 o'clock of the result of this consultation developed an | P. M., and the president ties a number of outburst of popular indignation that virtually decreed the destruction of the system of hereditary legislation. Wiser counsels have prevailed, in response to the voice of the nation, and by its action this morning the House of Lords has received a new and probably an indefinite lease of nominal power. The fact, however, that the bill has passed to a second reading by a majority of thirty-three votes, in the face of an unquestioned majority of fully twice that number against it, shows that the House of Lords is now and henceforth more ornamental than useful, as far as legislative purposes are concerned. It is merely the gilded figure-head of the ship of state; an institution possessing a high-sounding name, yet lacking all but the mere semblance of

THE DETECTIVE SYSTEM.

THE recent removal of the Chief of the Detective force is only one of a series of circumstances which have attracted an unusual degree of attention to the workings of the Detective Department of Philadelphia. So far as the difficulty about the distribution of the reward for the capture of the Bucks county criminal is concerned, it is but just to Mr. Eneu to say that he makes a strong defense, and that his allegation that he only followed a standing rule in portioning out the $500 among all who had exerted themselves to produce the desired end appears to be well founded. The public can have no deep interest in squabbles of this nature, and they care little whether the prize money was or was not doled out according to the strict rules of detective justice. The quarrel is only significant on account of the indication it gives that the detectives employed and paid by the city are more anxious to devise ways and means to increase their emoluments than to make a square stand-up, disinterested fight against crime and criminals. It may be very verdant to suppose municipal detectives will consider their salaries a fair equivalent for their best services; but if their legitimate pay is not sufficient, it would be much better to increase it than to encourage the disposition to keep a sharp lookout for rewards, and to form offensive and defensive alliances with thieves, counterfeiters, and burglars. It is an old maxim that you should "set a thief to catch a thief," and a certain degree of familiarity with the haunts and practices of criminals is no doubt necessary to detect them. But it is an easy matter to carry this idea too far, and corrupt associations between the officers of justice and the foes of society do infinitely more harm than good. The spirit of our laws and of our people is THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH well expressed in the enactments which forbid the compounding of felonies. But such enactments are of little use if detectives are permitted to grant a license for crime to petty and sats provided. Public invited. criminals in exchange for their occasional and sold Public criminals in exchange for their occasional Evening Telegraph whom a large reward is offered. The complaint is made in various quarters that the character; and a correspondent of a New York paper, writing from Philadelphia, says that "if the thieves were known and punished the business of detectives as well as thieves would be broken up, and that would be a bad job for the officials." The Chinese are said to have a system of paying their physicians liberally while health is preserved, and of stopping salaries as soon as sickness occurs. Our detectives are compensated in a different way: they flourish and grow rich only when many startling crimes are perpetrated; and when they are not animated by a high sense of duty, it is easy to understand that they would not feel specially interested in preventing or diminishing the growth of crime. Yet it is this service, above all others, that the public desire and expect them to perform. If they cannot render it, the department might as well be abolished as a branch of municipal government, and the public left to rely solely upon private detective agencies. All the bargainers with thieves, who conspire to make crime profitable, should be treated as common enemies of society and punished as such; and certainly the detectives in the pay of the city should be not only pure, but above suspi-

THE MANNER OF VOTING IN

UNDER such a government as that of France everything connected with the management of public affairs is conducted on a precise system, which would perhaps not be either possible or desirable in a demogratic country. It is certain, however, that too many safeguards cannot be thrown around the ballotbox, and in our large cities, at least, matters have come to such a pass that honest men of all parties see the necessity for more stringent regulations in the manner of voting, even at the expense of some inconvenience to voters. As much interest has been excited by the recent French elections, a brief description of the manner of conducting the balloting will not be inopportune, and we may obtain an idea or two that will be of practical value to ourselves.

Each elector is provided with a card showing the district, the date of the election, and the name, age, and business of the bearer. This is his certificate of registration, and without it he is not permitted to deposit his vote. The election is conducted under the superintendence of the mayor of the arrondissement, or a delegate, who selects two of the oldest and two of the youngest of the electors present as scrutateurs or judges, and these, with the president and secretary, constitute the bureau.

At the appointed hour the polls are opened, and each elector hands his folded ballot to one of the scrutateurs, who gives it to the president, who drops it into the box after satisfying himself that it is not duplicated. Another scrutateur ascertains whether the elector has his card, from which he tears off a corner, to show that strings around the ballot-box, seals it, and gives it into the keeping of the soldiers of the National Guard.

The same routine is gone through with on each day, and then the election is over. The votes are counted immediately by the bureau on a large table, which is, by law, placed in such a manner that the electors can walk around them and inspect the operation to see that it is fairly done. No vote is noted on the tally-sheet until it is submitted to two of the scrutateurs. Two days afterwards the aggregate vote of the several precincts is counted at the Hotel de Ville by a commission, and if no candidate has received a majority of votes, a second election is held a week afterwards, when a plurality of votes is suffi-

The main features in which this method of conducting elections differs from our own are the counting of the votes in public, as to the expediency of which much may be said on both sides in this country, and the presentation of registration certificates by the electors. This appears to be an excellent and unobjectionable plan for checking illegal voting, which we might adopt with propriety and benefit. It would impose no hardship or inconvenience that citizens who are solicitous to prevent fraud would not readily submit to; indeed, it would be no inconvenience at all, but rather an assistance to both electors and the election officers under our Registry law, and it is well worthy of the consideration of those who are anxious to preserve the purity of the ballot-box, and to make our elections fair expressions of public opinion.

THE ENTHUSIASM of the correspondents at the Boston Peace Jubilee is, of course, not to be measured by ordinary standards, but will naturally reflect something of the grandeur of the occasion. One of the correspondents of the Press expects to hear something like it in a rather far distant future, but not until then. He says: -

"Never till I stand within the gates of the 'far-off celestial city,' and listen to the melody of the 'hundred and forty-four thousand' in white raiment, do I expect to be moved as I was this afternoon by the 'Judgment Hymn.'"

And he adds, with an appreciation of what is more to the popular taste even than the melody of the "hundred and forty-four thousand"-

"It was indescribably grand. But, after all, I be-lieve the greatest enthusiasm is for the 'Anvil Chorus."

made on the night of May 29, 1869, to drill the Banker's chest received from you a few month ago. From facts that have come to our knowledge, it is evident that the attempt to open it was renewed on Sunday evening following. Finding all efforts to drill it useless, the effort was then made to break the lock. The hammering was heard by parties in the neighborhood for several hours, but supposing it to arise from the railroad men replacing a defective rall, excited no alarm. The tools, with the exception of the drills, were left. It is evident that they were not only prepared, but perfectly familiar with the construction of your Chest,
